

said, "I heard a man brought the seven heads of the snake and showed them to the Chief and told him, 'Chief, I am the one who killed the seven headed monster, here are the seven heads of the snake' and he showed the heads to the chief."

"The Chief is putting on a feast for this man because he was so brave in killing the seven headed snake. This is the story that the town crier is telling. The man that killed the monster brought the heads for the Chief to see," said his grandma. "To reward this hero, the Chief told him he could marry his daughter. The Chieftain is so pleased he is going to kill four of the animals, for a four day feast. So the people will eat four days. On the fourth and last day the Chief's daughter is going to marry the man that brought the heads." The boy said, "I am going to the feast." So he went to the village, two days later. He looked around and he went home. On the third day he told his grandmother he was going to the feast in the village. He went among the people, some of them were in bunches. He heard the people talking to each other and saying, "That man is brave," "He's a hero killing that monster. He brought the seven heads." The people are making a lot of noise over him. They were saying, "I saw the man and he is just a plain ordinary, uninteresting man." The boy said, "I also would like to see the man. Let's go see what the hero, the fearless one, looks like. Finally he saw him eating, laughing, teasing, and joking with anyone and everyone. He asked the chief if he could talk to the man that had slain the monster. The Chief said, "Go ahead, you can. He is the one that killed the snake with seven heads." The boy asked if he could see the seven heads of the snake. The man was arrogant, he was conceited and he was sitting with the Chief's daughter. The man said, "Sure here they are." He got the sack and emptied the heads out. The boy said, "I would like to ask another favor. Open their mouths and see if they have tongues." The man and the chief looked but there were no tongues in their heads. The Chief said, "No, there are no tongues." The man stood up from the table and looked around. The boy took a buckskin from his pocket and unfolded it. The Boy said, "I'm the one that killed the monster, here are the
