

tongues." He showed them the tongues that he had cut off the snake's heads, then threw the heads away. The town crier was telling the story about the orphan boy who was reared by his grandmother and had slain the monster.

The man didn't know what to do. His actions changes. He turned, backed away and ran through the crowd. The people saw him and chased him until they came to a ditch, then the woods. The town crier was shouting through the village again but this time to tell the people about the man that lied of killing the snake and ran away and about the boy that really did kill the snake. The boy was going to marry the chief's daughter, everybody was invited to eat--even the poor. The boy sat in the place previously occupied by the other man that lied. He ate with the chief's daughter and he put the tongues on the table in front of him so everybody that wanted to see them would be able to. As they viewed the tongues, comments could be heard, such as, "How in the world could he spit fire from them." "I can't figure it out." "They are large, fitting for a monster." "Whatever happened to the liar?" "Did they ever catch him?"

Speaking of the liar, I would tell his name if I knew it, which I don't, so I won't. He saved himself by being a fast runner.

The boy sat eating and every once in awhile he would turn around and feed his dogs. The Chief said, "I'm going to feed the hunting dogs also." He would tell people, "These dogs helped him to kill the monster."

THE FIRST MAN (told by Adam Le. Clair).

When man first came to earth he was all alone. He wondered around from place to place with no one to talk to. One day while he was walking he saw something in the air. He stood on a hilltop and watched this thing fly around. While he was watching it came down and landed on top of a tree. He saw that it was a huge bird. It was an eagle. He spoke to the eagle saying, "I am all alone, why can't we be friends, travel together, do what we can to help each other, you can be a help to me and I can help you too. For 4 days they traveled together
