

monkey and his wife were ashamed. No one from the village would notice or speak to them. But the newly married couple came out and celebrated again their wedding of the day before. The monkey and his wife were so shamed they left the village and went to a place where nobody knew who they were. The rest of the villagers enjoyed the feast and everybody lived happily ever after.

STORY OF TWINS

Indians believe that when twins die, they go into a different world and live in Prairies and swampy places. They believe you can see them and even hear them talking to each other in deserted places.

A long time ago there lived a couple that had twins. One day the older of the two died and shortly thereafter, the mother died leaving the one for the father to rear. The father cooked for him and cared for him as best he could. He always cautioned the boy not to wander too far from the house. So the little boy played around the house when his father went hunting. He played about four days at a swampy place. On the fourth day as he was playing, he went just a little too far from home. He would put sticks into the water, and let them float like canoes. Suddenly there was a boy the same size as he, and he was singing. The song went, "You have a father and eat meat soup. ~~Me~~ I have no father and I eat bean seed soup." They started talking to each other and they played together all day. That evening he went home but didn't tell his father about meeting the little boy. They played together for several days. When evening came he would run back into the swamp. Each evening the other boy would go home later and later. Finally, his father became worried and asked him where he had been playing. He got after him for staying away for so long night after night. He told his son, "Everytime I get home, you're still not home from playing. Where do you go?" He told his father, "One day I was playing with my stick canoes at the bottom of the swamp, where you told me not to play, and a little boy appeared. He is about the same size as I. He sings a song and I have learned it from him." He sang the song for his father. His father told him, "Son, that's your
