

Mrs.: Did you hear that Andrew?

(Why did they do that?)

Mr.: Jest in --

Mr.K: That's their tradition, I guess.

Mr.: they were tryin' to get even or they thought it eased their feelings to beat the water where the child drowned. Now, I'll tell you another one, this is a story that Jack Mahseet told me. Jack was one-eyed Indian.

Mrs.: had long--

Mr.: and he still wears long -- Jack told me that he had a brother that lived close to a creek, right north of Apache and he lost a daughter. Daughter died years ago.

Mrs.: Do you remember that?

Mr.K: Yeah --

Mr.: and he lived in two room house and after this daughter died, he wanted the house moved from that spot and he wanted the ground plowed up. They couldn't tell where the house even set. They moved the house. And Jack said he was plowing that ground with walking plow in those days and as he plowed he hit a bush and the bush flew back and hit him in the eye and knocked his eye out and that's how he lost his eye. That was Sidney Mahseets girl and Sidney after that moved the house upon the hill, I think where Tom Parker lives now. You remember that?

Mrs. : See, sir, I'm tellin' you facts. This fellow here, he's been here- I knew him when he was this high. Geroge tell 'em about how Miss Fisher, when she died, how they buried her. That was so interesting, I went to that funeral. Miss Fisher died, she was the fist Indian funeral I ever went to here.

Mr.: Well, the old Indians you take when Mahsetky died, I was to her
