

stayed with them always. I just raised by them. So I had to look after the cows what he had at there his horses: He had a big hog pen right west of there about hundred years from the house. And he just had one well, had to draw water, you know, so I'd go out there in the mornings and evenings and take water out there to the hogs though, you know, and I'd feed them. And west of there there's a big draw there you know, big lake, you know, like over there. That's where the cows and horses they drink water there, you know, we don't have to pump no water. So my grandfather lived there from the time he moved over there, he lived there about seven years after that. When I was about close to oh, I'd say about 17 when my grandfather died. Grandfather died when he was about 87, when he died, my grandfather. So they buried him in a, they took him body to the Catholic school and they had the mass there for him. So in them days he had to take him in a wagon, no kind of a hearse or nothing. And they had to wrap him up in a canvas. Wrap my grandfather in a canvas and a plain box. So they padded some things in there, and they layed his body in there and then they mailed it and took him in the wagon to the school, and they had the funeral there, service there for him. And from there they take him down there to the--that cemetery south of Anadarko there. They buried him there, and he was the first Indian that was buried in that cemetery there. And he had the first--steal fence around there where his grave was. And then right after that well, then there was another woman, I don't know who it was, buried right next to him on the north side. So my grandfather has done all of that. Worked all of those works which he has done everything, for the government, for himself, and got the place for his ex-wife, and he done everything, good work before he died. He done all of that. So he was pretty well known among the white people, among the Indians of all tribes, he was pretty well known for his deeds; for his words and for his bravery. What he had been doing while he was young. So we stayed there about a week after my grandfather died, then we moved to my mother's place from there. So ever since then, we've lived there.
