

Un Hunh. They let it down and then pull it up by hand. Now they use same method right now, only operated by machine. Mr. Wiggins just got through out there. They say - they call it drillin' in the west, but it's not really drilling. Now my sisters and I - - we drilled a well one time. We wuz just playing in the back yard. We drilled, oh I guess about 15 or twenty feet, and we built an oil derrick and there was three of us girls, we played like Tom-boys. We built an oil derrick and we fixed it where we could pump that. We made a pump on it where we could turn it by hand, you know. We made a bucket out of a milk can. Put it on to hold it where we could trip that bucket and pour oil in and it would run down a chute into a tank. We'd skim the oil off the slush pit. (unintelligible) You know, my sister and I drew a picture of those (unintelligible) one time. We were going to school in Texas then. We drew a picture for a family for a family, you know, was going to County Fair. We drew it with a brown crayola. We tack this cloth up on a blackboard - - this oilfield scene. And one girl, she couldn't draw nothin'. She couldn't draw flies. See. But she was the preacher's daughter. See. Do you know what? She got the credit for drawing that picture. She come in there and took credit. She said "Don't you think this should be colored?" And Grandma said she liked to slapped her out of the schoolhouse. ((Laughter)) When they hung that up and if it still down there, it's still on display at Linnie Roark's and that girl never touched it. She couldn't draw anything. See we took art, when my daddy was alive. You know he wanted us to learn it and we could draw pretty good and so, you know, he gave us art and take dancing lessons, you know it wasn't called dancing then. It was called expression. And now they call, - what do you call it? - Dramatics. And you know like Ballet and stuff like that. We had regular in school. That was part of our school lessons; it wasn't just a special thing, you know. But now then the kids in school - they got pictures of the
