

(Why didn't ~~more~~ decide to farm?)

Well, there was too much leased land. And of course that wasn't big money, but just a little bit. And sometimes the biggest trouble was that there were too many heirs on a piece of land. That's where the big trouble is. I have known as many as 90 or 80 heirs on one 160 when I worked at the Office. Some of them used to draw five cents a year as their share. And that's just another reason why they have to sell out and if they do, the rest of them have to go along with it. They hardly ever fight one another. They're not like white people, the way they fight. They agree.

(Are the Arapahoes the same way?)

Practically the same way. Of course we're getting some disagreements with one another. And what I like about it--white people may condemn them, but they're people that just don't bother anybody. They tend their own business. And they don't go where... And they don't try to force their way in in any place. They live the way they think is best. And they're not going to starve. If the neighbors over here don't have nothing to eat, they're going over here. "You come and eat." "All right." They share with one another. That's one good thing about it. But there is a new breed coming up, that's a little bit different--tough. Don't care.

(Talks about change in attitude of new generation.)

(These people that don't help their children go to school--are they people that are trying to get ahead in the old Cheyenne way¹--?)

No. No. They're mostly people that likes to hang around these bars.

(When did they open the bars to Indians?)

Back in the fifties.
