

anything you want to - you care to carry. Women bundle them up, ease out from camp behind your tents, you know. Just get out where the sentry won't see you. And you get out there and these boys will bring your horses in and you'll saddle 'em and wh're gonna go." So they done that. Got their saddles packed and a few belongings. Got their guns out of the pits where they buried them. Good arrows. They took out. They went as far as south of Watonga here. There's an Indian camp there then. Some ceremonials going on by the Arapahoes. They got there early that morning. So the Indians fed them. They told them what they were doin' - they was breakin' away from Fort Reno, going back to Montana. So they fed 'em, and some of 'em gave ponies to some of those Indians. Some Arapahoes give good ponies to those Indians. Extra ponies, you know. So, they took out. Gave them old guns, maybe, and bows and arrows, more food, and then they took out. There were two Indians that were scouts at Fort Reno at that tiem. One was sent from Lawrence, Kansas where he was imprisoned. A Cheyenne man by the name of White Elk. The committee of Senate of the United States had come out to check on these problems out here, stop at Lawrence, Kansas. They found this Indian there among other Indians. That was in prison there at Lawrence, Kansas. So they asked for his release to be transferred back to Fort Reno where the rest of his people were. So they brought him, and I think he acted as one of the scouts at Fort Reno, at that time. And there was an Arapaho Indian - we said he was Indian but I think he was a captive - white man, or at least he was recognized as an Indian. His name was Two Scalp Braids. You know, they used to have scalp braids. That was his Indian name. He's Arapaho. He had a son, and he's got grandkids livin' here now. So they were the two that was at Fort Reno, one Arapaho and one Cheyenne. But Indians left on, but the Cheyennes that got to Watonga were after them. They give 'em ponies and more food. They took on out. Traveled and traveled.
