

Charliè: Indian, He was Apache man. So I had to - - see, Indian's related. Well, I got stepfather, we call him Kagin, one of the great peyote man, number - - one of the great ones, big ones. He said, "Well, son," he said, "I'm gonna tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna fix you peyote and I'm gonna pray. I'm gonna give it to you." And he said, "You go to sleep and when you get up, if you feel like walking, get up and walk. Nobody ain't gonna help you. You do it on your own." So he put about five or six together, you know. And he made big one. Boy, it was just soft, you know. Then he prayed. When he got through, he said, "Now." "Make a motion four times and just inhale, and it'll go its self." So done that. And when he done that, well, he took it. Then he went to bed. And we han't touch him no where, or even a bed shake or anything, it hurts and he cried all the - - so, he layed down. And we had a arbor out there, say fifteen feet or so - - it's all nice clean path, you know. And we was sitting in the arbor. And the old man, while he was sitting there he was telling stories. Pretty soon he woke up. About three o'clock he woke up. He said, "I'm coming over there." "All right." Old man, we want him to talk to him. So he says, "Come over, son." So he says, "All right, I'm gonna come over there. I'll be over." He got a cane, you know, himself and he walked slow, and he kept on and kept on, and finally he got there. Said, "How are you? You want to sit up or you want to lay down?" So he said, "No," he said. "I want to sit up." So they fixed him a pillow, a place to sit down and he sit up there, telling stories, and from then on he never did lay down. His leg went down. That leg went plumb down. This man I was telling you about I want after way down at Verdon, he was a purty powerful man. And he would make these - - what they call those thorns? - - oh, them horny toads. He'd make them horny toads, you know, in a handkerchief. He'd put a handkerchief up you know, and hold that off and then it would be a horny toad. And he'd take and pick it up and then (Unintelligible words) it disappeared. Yeah
