

(When did this Crooked Foot die?)

Her husband died first. And she stayed single, I think, three or four years, and she married Grant Left Hand. Chief of Left Hand, Arapaho (I think he means son of the Chief Left Hand.) And I think he died. I think back in 1914 or 1915 or 1916. And the year after that she died. She went back to her people in Colony. And she died. She was a aunt of this Bird's Head--my cousin's husband. And several other Birdsheads, they were her nephews and nieces. They took care of her but she died afterwards.

(She died about 1915 then?)

No, she --she died about 1918 or 1919--somewhere along in there. No--it was 1921 or 1922.

(Did you ever see her conduct meetings?)

No, I never did. I never did.

(Did you ever hear how she did conduct meetings--I mean, how she would run it?)

No, I never heard. She always tell her husband just how to conduct that meeting by her songs, and what came next, and how to proceed with that fumigation and breakfast and the eating of peyote and fumigation and all that stuff. She told her husband just what to do. Of course, he know it already, but she always kept him informed. And then I know one time she brought water in and somebody told her, "Do this and that..." "Wait, now," she said, "I know what I'm gonna do." She was independent.

(Where would she sit?)

Anywhere where there was room for her. She didn't sit with her husband. She sits with other women. Her sister-in-law--her husband's sister--Long Nose--used to be in there all the time, and two or three other women. She'd always sit with them.

(Where would her husband be sitting?)
