

Press, that's the one by the way, that was bombed last week. You know about that? Well, there's a story behind that too, maybe it shouldn't be stated but the senator used to be from over there, the state senator, a lawyer, and he was bombing, had a bombing agency. But this editor Ted -- wrote a series of articles about the crime wave in Cherokee County and he got dangerously near to exposing people. Almost mentioning names see. And somebody gave him a dose of powder. Because, again this was a Cherokee reaction to a man who could go -- from somebody and charge them a high price. To defend them and still cast the crime in the public press. And I'm not mentioning names who the senator is. But I see the friction and they haven't found out who the senator is. But I see.

(But you think the Indians did it?)

I don't know. But I happen to know there are two secret societies in the--and the Night Hawks, are quite active around Talequah. And I've had more than one sheriff tell me that in other words it's a false sense of justice to them. And they didn't kill anyone. The place was a wreck. Now the man that's editor, they didn't kill -- editor Ted --, I'm acquainted with him because he used to live out at Qualls in fact I buried one of his aunts. He was sincere in crusading but this--the Cherokee sense of justice was not there. But he should crusade, but of course people were pilfering cattles around Tenkiller Lake, you see. Making we think all there seemed to some kind of gang operating inside of Tulsa. They'd go in the middle of the week and see the people came out on week-ends to Tenkiller cabins. They lived out there and during the week there would be -- and televisions and radios and guns and things would be gone. And there was a little bit
