

And I told him, I thought you said it'd be easier. He said, I forgot to tell you they change it every two years. Went back again, finally took my test, and got a high school diploma.

JEALOUSY AMONG INDIANS

(Clinton, you brought up something a few minutes ago that I've heard quite often among most of the Indian people all over the state about the jealousy between Indian groups, within tribes and envious if somebody gets a better job or something like this.)

Clinton: Yes. Happens to fall into money or gets a brand-new car, well somebody.

(Do you think they're ever going to come to a point where they, I heard tonight a statement by Lamont Brown, I thought was quite interesting, which I've kinda preached for a long time was that you're all Indians, and the Indians are going to have to work together as a race to try to help themselves all over rather than just to stay with this small jealousy sort of thing that they get into?)

Well, that's true, like here in town, an Indian can do anything, just about anything a white man can do. It's not as bad, they aren't discriminated as bad as they used to long, say 15, 20 years ago. But I been married in Watonga say 14 years, and they used to be little bit like that. But this veterinarian, he hired me to work for him, I was working at (not clear). So we used to work, and we used to go to cafes and the beer joints, and they'd say, "Sorry, we don't serve Indians." So he said, "Ok, if this boy ain't good enough, I aint good enough. The heck with your place." So the next time we go in, everything be all right. (There were enough people like that to help make the change.)

Yeah, he claimed to be part Sioux, but he come in here, just got out of school, and he, veterinarian school, and I went to work with him, so he got rich. I worked for him 'bout nine years.