

Till noon time and then they'd get off and cook lunch and the baby would wake up and be around the rest of them. Still in the cradle. They take it out and give it a rest. Those are the things that I've seen.

(Well, these young men today, that go into the army and go overseas and fights and they have combat experiences and they come back and tell about their experiences--what kind of stories would you call those?)

Well, I know two or three. This boy--this couple that was married --the girl's father was my grand-nephew. And he had experience in combat. And sometimes, like if a Gourd Dance organization dances or this Starhawk, we have to have at least two that tell their war coup. Now he's one of them that we intend to use of his experience in combat. How he subdued the enemy.

A WORLD WAR II STORY

And I got another grand-nephew--my brother's grandson--where they have that Barefoot Park pow-wow. He owns that quarter-section of land there. My brother gave it to him--his grandfather. And he lives on that place and he allows the Indians to use that campground for pow-wows. He's got a story or two of his experiences--the way he captured seven Japs. They were all armed and he was armed. He got the upper hand on them and made them drop their guns and hold their hands up, and he marched them back a little ways and he gathered all them guns and took all the ammunition out of their guns and put it in his pocket and then piled the guns up. And he had his gun ready all the time. And some of them had wrist watches, and some had watches--whatever they had in their pockets. He took that all out and put it
