

(Which one--the Greenfield Baptist Church ?)

Yeah. But I think he's buried with his oldest son. I think he's buried with him, because there's two graves there. They got a marker on Left Hand's grave.

(A stone marker?)

STORY ABOUT CUSTER'S LAST STAND HEARD FROM NORTHERN ARAPAHO WOMAN

(Well, I kind of got off on this subject. I originally was going to ask you to tell me some stories--some haedaeta--)

Yeah. haedaeta. That's gone, until we see Myrtle. But of course other stories are pretty much public, pretty common among people, and I was trying to think of some old comical stories--especially brother-in-law stories. But I can't like them too good at the present time. That's just joking stories, you know, just comical stories, told by one brother-in-law against another one. Now I know a story that was told to me by a woman, eye-witness at the time of Custer's last stand. I was up there working with the Smithsonian--not the Smithsonian, but in connection with--well, I was working with Professor at Columbia University, Dr. Henry Elkins. And he arranged through the Smithsonian that I was connected with, if I could go out to Wyoming and stay with him out there--which I responded to, willingly. And he and I went out and got stories. What we had to do--we had to get a chunk of meat. Old folks like meat, you know. Good, tender meat. And first we went to the trading post at the Agency at Fort Washakie and then we come back and stop at the home of the old gentleman and we give him the food. They'd be booking dinner. And then we'd sit out there and then the old man would come out with his pipe, his blanket on, and his folks would bring chairs out and we'd be sitting and telling stories. But this particular one that I wanted to know for my own personal information about what Arapahoes were there at the time Custer was attacked--attacked Siouxs and Cheyennes. Well, one party told me, "An old woman lives out here about a couple or three miles. She was there. She tells the story. So I determined to go out there and see
