

anymore. I know a lot of times you go places and if you are going on business or something you know if the T. V. is going, they don't turn it off. They just keep right on watching television.

(That has killed visiting too. The advent of T. V. has killed visiting.)

It has really killed visiting. But I know that coming of electricity in rural areas have advanced a whole lot in the last 20 years. I know when I was at home growing up, the deep freeze—refrigerators or something like that was outrageous, you know, to even thought of.

APPRECIATES OPPORTUNITY FOR EDUCATION

I think my mama and daddy did pretty good by two of us kids. Sent us to high school. Laverne didn't finish high school but they did everything they could to educate—well I guess all of us. You know, sending those kids off to school when they were younger, I think they all felt a little resentment, you know. They wasn't thinking that parents maybe didn't care anything about 'em.

(Well, it was a blessing or disguise, maybe as I look at it. It was the only chance some of us had of ever getting an education.)

Oh, yeah. But I don't think they looked at it like that though. I think they looked at it in different way. And mamma used to say, "Well they had to walk to school, you know, and lotta times when it was bad like the snow was on the ground they couldn't get to school and they just couldn't provide for an education like they needed." And now you know we got buses practically comes right to the door and pick you up. There's not a reason in the world why Indian children can't have education now.

(None whatever.)

Not any.

(But there's so many of 'em though that are not taking advantage of the opportunity they have.)

And I think that this—what's this program where they drill you a well and
