

There's a spring, used to be right there.

(It's still there.)

We owned that whole section land that lies south.

(It's all changed now, I guess. Was there any roads in there that you can remember when you was a small fellow?)

Just in the section like that's all. Yeah, that's pretty good roads but they just wagon roads. And Kena Grave Yards, you know where that's at don't you. That's where all my folks is buried.

(Was you living down in that country when they had that big cyclone in Peggs?)

I was living at Clear Creek, back this away. You know where Clear Creek is?

(I'm not sure.)

It's north of Ely, north and a little bit west. About three or four miles. We could see it, just a black funnel. That's been a long time ago.

(That was on a Sunday evening when it hit that town.)

Yeah.

(Lots of people killed that time. Well, I think they was finally counted, there was sixty-eight people killed there, and there was several Indians killed in that cyclone.)

Let's see there was some Wilkersons in there wasn't there?

(Yeah, there was still a few left around there, but not many.

There use to be a Wilkerson up there at Pawhuska, he use to work for Ray Hayes and took care of chickens, what was his name? Great big tall, black headed man.

(Samuel?)
