

Dull Knife. Well, we don't know but we sure--

((GLADYS MANN)) How about those northern Cheyennes? They bury their brethern there at that (?)

(I was wondering, after hearing about the northern Cheyenne and the southern Cheyenne, how did they split up?)

Did you ever see that show Cheyenne Autumn. You never did? It tells--it shows.

See, they brought all these Cheyennes, not all Cheyennes, but all these different tribes of Indians to Oklahoma. Well, you've read of that Cherokee, that trail of Tears? Well, it was like that. They brought them to Darlington and well, they didn't like being penned up or what you call it. They were prisoners, or I don't know. Anyway, part of them decided to go back toward north. So they escaped. Just those that wanted to. They didn't make--force all of them. Well, these that went back, they had a leader but what was his name? Some chief, he was kind of leader. Little Wolf, or I don't know. Anyway he led a band of tribe out of Darlington, or Reno, you know where Ft. Reno --they went back. I was in winter time. Anyway lot of them died on way--hunger, froze, anywaht they had hard time going back. But they made it and they the ones that up north now--that escaped at that time. And these others that stayed, like us, we the southern. That's how they split. Northern and southern Cheyenne.

(Well, whent hey went north there was a group left over there at Hammon, that White Shield Camp.)

Yeah, that's true. Some of them they backed out.

((GLADYS MANN)) What about that Old Man Goose. He foot it from Montana, here. In three months time. Walked from there. He didn't like it over there or something.

((LAURA BIG HORSE)) Well, that's where the Cheyennes originally came from , up north. Montana and all up there--Wyoming, Colorado, and all through there. (?)
