

that land. This old fellow (Unin) he was the head chief, they were dealing with Governor Joe and them fellows. So they were doing that and they were down here. Then the civil war was in there and they had to get over, right along in there, I'm not too clear on that, cause the army they ceded from the government just like the southern states did, cause they went out from under the U.S. government. So they had to take him back in when they did, 'cause they finally settle down. Well, this band, they took this band back, the government did, cause they were rebels just like these other people. So we got a picture of that. There's pictures of that, Walter has got one over there. Josephine Walter's got one. They say that belongs to Julia Bacon -- said she was claiming that now, said that was her picture. I don't know how - I don't understand about that. Anyway, there's a picture of that old man when they took him back with these Union soldiers, this officer, why he's the one made the treaty with him I guess. Then went back under the U.S.

(Unin). He's the one who brought that coat, that uniform, he brought that back, his daughter got married, why he's the one who put that coat on her. So that's how they got started. He was over there too, they said he went to Washington. He was gone for two or three years. These people thought he must have died- they thought he died- he never did come back. Finally, he came back. Well, he had that uniform, he had a lot of things he got over in Washington. The way Joe Mathews tells it is about him- his history. This one is in New York City, what they call that museum--not that in Washington? He said they got a lot of that about this old man. He was wondering who he was and he thought all his people were already gone, I guess he never did any research on him. But he said they got a lot of things on this old man. He was back in that part of the history. Well, then he came this way and they were around here. They already sold that land. That's what caused trouble with that dance.
