

her paint on her, and her hair was kind of mussed up. So they asked their little brother, they said, "What does our sister do?" Every time we leave in the morning she looks so nice and her hair is combed slick and she paints up, and when we come home, she's just all gray. Does she go to the water and stay in there?" Instead of answering his brothers, he said--he was talking to their sister and he said, "You know when that water begins to move--you know, when it comes out of that water--" Sister turned around and looked at him--for him not to tell it. "Just don't tell it. Keep quiet." That's what his sister told him. So he hushed. He didn't go any further. But these boys already heard it and they got suspicious. Why she didn't want their little brother to tell it to these six boys? And the boys got together and one of these boys said, "I'm going to stay home and try to catch who this is that comes out of the water." Close to that lake there was a thicket of--you know, like willows or some kind of weeds. So he went and hid there. Sure enough, there she come again with her hides. She went over there to act like she was going to soak another hide. And this whatever it was--that moves this whole water--it must have been looking for her. So this little boy would wade away--kind of back up and wait there. But this girl wasn't a bit afraid. She'd go near to the water--right close to the water. And then this water would begin to move. Pretty soon something would come up from the water. And she was right there. And this boy was already behind those bushes. And just as soon as this monster came out, he shot it. He killed that monster, I think he said. And then he turned around and shoot his sister. And he said--this woman had two children. And this little boy--the little brother, I guess. And I don't know where the little boy went, but this boy cut up their sister. Cut up this woman,
