

around them, and he saw that they were tied. So that's when he was trying to loosen them. And he didn't have no teeth. And finally I guess he got them knots soaked with his mouth and then they began to get loose. And they both got loose. And they both sat up and looked around. Then she said again, "I wish there was a dugout here," she said. "So we could just move in it to live." And when they looked over there, sure enough, there was a dugout. I don't know whether these people built it and left it. And they went in there. And they made that their home. And they came back and sat around. This little boy said, "Sister, I saw a deer running down that way." He said, "There he goes--look at it, sister!" He was pointing in some direction. "There it goes!" She said, "No." She was so sad and down-hearted. She said, "If I was to look at that deer, you think it's going to fall for me? For me to eat? Do you think it will fall for me?" He said, "Well, just look, sister. Just look!" She said, "No. I don't want to look." "Please, sister, just look one time." She looked over there. By that time this deer fell. And she went and cut it up and they ate it. And then after they used that up, they went out and sat again. And he said, "Sister, there goes a deer--running that way!" "I'm not going to look. What's the use of looking at it? We can't catch them or kill them no way!" "Well, just look at it, sister!" He just begged her to look. She looked over there again. Just then that thing fell. She went and got it again and they ate it. And then maybe after he got so big he went out and hunted. He hunted and hunted and brought all kinds of game, like deer and antelope and maybe he even brought buffalo if he was big enough. And must have got hold of these little baby lions, and they raised them to be big lions. And she said, "Catch one of those crows. I'm going to give them the fattest part of this meat. I'm going
