

And this woman was telling this other woman--see, she had begun to understand them, I guess. And she told her lady friend, and she had a boy with her, I think. A boy was with them. It might have been that woman's son, because she was by herself when she was captured. And she said, "Let me tell you. You don't have to turn these over with a stick or anything. They're going to turn over themselves." "Oh, no," she said. "They can't turn over themselves--you have to turn them over." She said, "No," she said. "I bet you anything--it's going to turn over itself." "All right," she said, "I'll just meet your bet," she said. "If this thing turns over itself, I'm going to send my son to go get you a horse and we'll saddle it for you. And we'll fix you a lunch. You fix your lunch and we're going to send you back home. If thing turns over itself." So she right away jumped up and got her things ready. She said, "You just watch it. It's going to turn over." So she went back there. She was anxious for it to turn over, you know, after it was done on one side. Sure enough, this thing began to turn over itself. She said, "All right, now. Run over there and get her a horse. We done promised her that." This boy went over there and got a horse for her. And they saddled it for her and put a bridle on and everything, and gave her everything that she was going to need in her lunch. She got on that horse and she beat it back home. She got back to her people. That leg muscle saved her.
