LAND WHERE INDIAN HOSPITAL IS LOCATED

(How did your husband manage to get the hospital land?) :

Well, way back there, when he was in it yet, they were working on the cemetery. They wanted to get some more land from the cemetery. And see, the Public Health stepped in after they build this hospital. My husband went out and staked that hospital right now, and as soon as they were given that right to go ahead and build a hospital. They went and surveyed it. He used to be with the Soil Conservation, you know, and Engineers. And they surveyed that. And he planted all them trees down to the highway. He did. And he staked right there. And he got some more land--him and two or three men--including John Otterby, I think. No--not John Otterby--it was Woodrow Wilson. Him, and then there was somebody else. They kept working on it, working on it, till they got so many more acres for that cemetery for the Indians. And then they kept working on the rest of that land. See, it was Cheyenne and Arapaho government land. That land belonged to a Cheyenne woman from here. And when she moved to Colony, she exchanged her land --this land where the hospital is--with some government land over there. And that's how come her land became government land, where they got this hospital built. And then the rest of it went to the Public Health. White people took it over. And, now since he's been in there, they just not got it back. So it's our land today again.
