

dog was trying to say. This dog would look back at her and she stood there all the time. And then I think she finally went and told her son what this dog was doing. Right away they all got in--I think those days they have to drive in wagons yet. Wagon and team. And sure enough, they saw this horse. Oh! Just by then this horse was coming in. Oh, then they got scared when this horse was walking in without him. So they followed that road. There he was, under the bridge, frozen to death. And that was the main event then. His name was White Tail. "When White Tail froze to death."

HUNTING IN EARLY RESERVATION PERIOD

(Did everybody--the Cheyennes from all the districts--know about that?).

Yes. The reason they know the happenings, they were together. And that was down at Fort Reno. And then when they went out hunting for wild game--their food, well, a whole group of them--like the relatives stayed together like bands. Bands of people. Well, out of that maybe so many went. And from another band so many went. They all go in one bunch. And after they got so far, maybe some of them went this way. And maybe turned north. And they just kind of went every--(where). And then pretty soon they'd all come back and meet again. Just like--I think I told you about my father, when my uncles went from here to Fort Reno, when they heard that those soldiers were hunting those Indians that were out hunting. See, they used to do that. And you know, some of these that didn't have very good horses--that had horses that were kind of slow--they hunted around here. And the ones that had fast horses--good running horses--they were the ones that went
