

And finally they killed him. And then those women would start to go up here and 15 or 20 men rushing at them. I told you about this woman having a little boy about twelve years. And this little boy had arrows and those men when they was chasing, this little boy, he'd shoot those men and once in a while he succeeded hitting one and knocked them down. So the rest of them was afraid of him and give them women a chance to get up higher out of the way. So this boy, he's running too, but when they try to get close, he stops them and shoots at them and check them down, so the women made it to the top of the hill and they're safe. But those down at the bottom, they commence to raid the camp. And they picked up the heads and throwed them in them brass buckets. And carried them off and they burned all the tipis and the belongings. And the people that went off that night--fled away--that believed the Indians, they were saved over there. Near Rainy Mountain. Maybe about 15 miles or so away. They began to see where the camp was--where they could tell there was a battle. And in the early morning, after the sun came up, they could see the smoke--fire smoke over the village. They knew that something had happened over there. They knew but they was waiting for a long time, they fight over there and the whole village was gone. And these men disappeared and went off after the men came in from hunting. They got on the trail to try to find them and they went on top of next mountain--on the south. And it seems that they had a ceremony over there. They had 40 or 50 heads on the edge of a high mountain ridge about like that. All laid side by side facing the village--the heads. Then they left them up there.
