

Dance they were raiding down clear to the Gulf coast. That the capture of Mr. Boin-edal that we were talking about.

(Would you say that name again?)

Boin-edal. Well, the government--he was on the government rolls. The government called him B-O-I-N-A-D-L-E. It's interpreted to mean "Big Blond." I gave you a piece of Bionadle's story and I have the outline of it. I don't know, Boinadle, I thought I had it here. I had an outline of Boinadle's life. Boinadle was captured. Boinadle was full-blooded German. He was raised in Germany. He attended school in Germany. And seems it was his father and mother died over there. I don't know whether it was, anyway, his parents moved from Germany to--must have been--he said they come through the Gulf of Mexico and located where a large river empties into the Gulf. Must be the Mississippi River, isn't it?

(Now is this the Kiowas--his folks?)

Germans.

(His folks--oh, I see.)

They was white immigrants. Of all nationalities everyday. And they had most of the people could immigrate from the old countries and the other countries, and they settled where there was a bunch already there. And they work together. And his father settled there with his step-mother and another brother. Well, he said he had a step-mother. Well, his mother died over there or here, I don't know, but anyways, he was living with his step-mother. He said he was just about two years in America before he could speak English. He hadn't learned the language yet. He hadn't learned the English language yet. When the Indians raided the
