that you can consider. He's not accepted in your organizations and not accepted in church life. These are things to think about, because if a person has to drink for a means of escape there's some reason for it, and if we'll stop and think what would cause something like this, then we can really get at the root causes of poverty and people outside of this community that should be brought in and be a part of it. Just think that if every person was working, and the mayor just reported that you are getting a new industry here and the Indian Bureau is helping to bring in the industry. And the reason for that is because you have a large Indian population in this area and the Indians are a great asset to you. The Indians are going to be working. More Indians will be working. More non-Indians will be working. Business people will be making more money and it's just for selfish reasons alone that it's worthwhile to look into new ideas and new approaches to things. Sometimes we get so caught up in the way things used to be that we think we would like to live in the past. We reminisce about the good old days, and as my husband says, he remembers some of the good old days; it was dirty and he had to pick cotton and bail hay. He said he remembers cleaning out the kerosene lamps and haul water from the well. He says that's not particularly the good old days to him. We cloud our memories with what we like to think of as the past.

Time and time again in speeches that he's made, one of the points that he makes is that we have got to understand that times are changing. That changes are developing all around us and this is why you're very progressive tonight.

I don't know if you really realize how really progressive you are by having a meeting such as you are having together and talking things out and understanding. I met with a group of people from the Department of Education in Washington. As you know, President Johnson made a speech about the new Indian program, about the new approach. And that we should put termination com-
