

em'. And they took me up. Got up there and there was two tanks of oxygen, and they began to tie me into it. And I tried to intervene by saying that I was alright. But anyhow they put those oxygen tubes into my nose, mouth. And they began to take some note of it. One of them say, "Say, I kinda checked off respiration there and he's nose cleared, seemed to be. Let's go down, down in the basement that big one"--I heard them say that. And they took me down there, and they connect me up with that. And they asked me questions and they say, "What Doctor did you have?" And I say "Doctor down there at Antlers." Well, there's something wrong--you don't have--he don't have anything--nothin' but a fever and some kind. You don't have--I said, "Chills, chills all I have." They began to dismantle what they had and they took me back up there and I said, "Chills is what I had. You got anything that will stop the chills, well, let me have it. I've got fever now." They brought me five pills, I think, it was about inch long. Biggest thing I ever saw. Take all of them at the same time. Then you wait an hour and you take same amount at that time. Wait an hour, and then you take five more. Maybe about four times, something like that. And they quit, by joe. They never did give me any more trouble. They never did give me any more trouble. I haven't have one since.

DEFENDENT IN WHISKEY CASE IS ACQUITTED

(You had them a long time. How'd you feel about how Indians tried Indians? Did you ever watch any of it--hear any of their courts?)
No, yes, I'll say yes, one time, we had what we call district court--composed of so many counties, kinda like now--like we have. And there was one down here at Elixir--nithin' there now, but Elixir post office, no post office now, I don't think. It's near--

(Is that a Choctaw word?)
