

them some covers for the bed, they wanted a hollywood bed. Well you know I could get almost any price for those that I'd ask. And, you know, I didn't even know her name. You know I felt like she deserved part of it, you know, at least once for the suggestion and the help and I didn't know her name. But finally, I got over at (not clear) place (not clear)--place over there and I found out it was Phillips. Now that's not a Seminole name by any means, and that was her name, Phillips.

(She was a Seminole?)

Uh-huh, Seminole Indian, only one I know of (not clear). Well, there used to be that one with a background of feathers and we can't get those kind of feathers anymore, it's against the law. I guess she meant egrets, I don't know what else. Did you ever see a lot of egrets? Well, here's the quill and then there's just little layer on each side, these little fine feathers you know, grows down and makes a little kind of a curve, usually ends are curled up. They used to split those and wear them under their chin for head-dresses, women did. But they weren't supposed to wear anything like war bonnets, but they did have some head dresses. And then all at once it got to be a great big fine you know, to have egrets on your hat. So, of course, women quit wearing them. But they are very beautiful. I never did see but just a few of 'em live. What person do you ever see that mixes greens and blues and she mixed from a hot orange to a purple or plum, and makes it look right. They used to have gorgeous displays of Indian costumes. Regular hand made Indian costumes and it was just--oh I don't know. Of course now your Cherokee colors are red white and blue for the beadwork. Well then, the Creeks were red, green and orange like the--or yellow; like Mexicans--Old Mexico colors. But now, they--my folks never could agree on anything and when they made my costume, part of it was red, white and blue and that--let's see
