

Indians, originally, you know the Chereokees are. We are told that there was a big famine, must have been a drouth you know that caused the famine. And this bunch of Indians now, they didn't call 'em that, they didn't call 'em what you said. I can't think of it, but anyway they banded together with the Cherokees and the Creeks. See, on occasions they were friendly--when one had something the other one didn't have and they had to kinda make it together, you know. Well, they found this tribe that had gotten lost. They had gone--they had arrows pointed towards Florida, all along there they would find them on the trees. Well, they said we know a place we can take you. We haven't enough food ourselves to keep you. But we know where we can take you that you can get for yourselves, your food. And so they--this arrow would point toward Florida. They'd find 'em ever once in a while, these trees, with these arrows. Well, now where would you go in a famine, in a drouth, where would you go for food. All kinds of fish food that would keep them, that would sustain them until they could get something else. Well, when they got down there, there's a lot of 'em just stayed there. Well, now that's where that tribe disappeared to, y'see. But along the way some of them stopped, way before they got to Florida. And I think that that's a--do you know what tribe I'm trying to tell you about, what the name of it is?

(Yeah, that's the Lost Tribe.)

Well now, I say that they went to Florida and stayed with the Seminoles down there and just was kinda absorbed by the Seminoles, just like the Yuchi were absorbed by the Creek tribe.

SCOTCH NAMES

But now where they got these Scotch names. Along the road, well there was a band of Scotchmen, they had the same trouble, they didn't have any food, well, they went along with the tribe. Well, naturally they inter-married
