

Yes, we do. But right now you can't hear them on account of them old katydids. The katydids takes up all the racket you know. I read someplace where, well you just make up your mind that you're going to listen and with all that constant--all kinds of music going on at night you know and if you were some place where you could--where you couldn't hear them things, you'd be lonesome.

(Do you have screech owls?)

Yes but they don't start hollerin' until long in the fall.

(But you have some up here?)

Uh-huh,

(Well now they--)

All type of owls. We got a lot of 'em around these little ponds. That's the first things opens up in the spring, you know. And I read a lot of these things like that you know. I read someplace where it said the spring frogs opens up about four times. Before warm weather really gets here, and then they freeze up. Water will freeze up on 'em and then they'll quiet down till the next warm-up and then they open up again. I think it's four times. The fourth time is when spring is really here.

(Well, I'll have to remember that. I think I've heard that too.)

Get out. Go on. (talking to dog.)

(But there is so much that is interesting in the woods that people miss.)

Yes, they are--

(Now like the traffic--)

I don't believe I'd like to live in town.

(No I don't.)

Especially, in the bigger towns, like Tulsa and towns like that. (not clear)

There's a little patch that grows right down here by the road, then there's another thing that's disappearing and that's this old time broom weed. People used to make brooms, you know to sweep their yards. You know, anymore, people
