

Cecil: No, I know, but he brought his wife.

Jenny: He couldn't, they ain't no Comanches over here.

Cecil: No, he brought--old man Chibato married Apache woman, and when he run off from the reservation, he brought her to Oklahoma.

Jenny: That woman died here lately. (speaks Kiowa) She always just sit around.

Cecil: (speaks Kiowa) But she was Apache, Binero's wife.

Jenny: I think you find out more from ---

Cecil: I think we find out more over there. I tell you what I'll do. When I go to church over there sometime, and I'll get some details on that about his wife, about his mother, whether she, the way I understand it, they run off--him and his wife--and came to Oklahoma. It must have been after she died, the Apache one, then he married a Comanche. So that make Jim Chibato, their son, Comanche half-breed.

(Well, do you have any idea when he doctored Joshua Kaulity? Would you have any idea what year that was?)

Cecil: That was not long--but I don't know. (speaks Kiowa)

Jenny: I don't know. It's hard to get the years.

(Well, would it be, say, like before World War I? Or after World War I?)

Jenny: It must be before World War I.

Cecil: Yeah. Fifty, I'd say about 54--somewhere, 54 or 55. I don't know exactly the year just when it was. We'll have to find out on that.

Jenny: It's before the World War I.

(Well, was it when you were a young man?)

Cecil: Old Man Chibato?
