

time he was awake, this boy just look at him and crawl out of his covers and just crawl away. You know, just try to get away, crawl away. He didn't catch him or nothing. He just watch him way out messing around. So he crawl out and he was watching him. And then he got up and started to run that way. After a while he heard them coyotes holler. Here he came back. He didn't chase him or nothing because he know he wouldn't get away. He heard them coyotes and here he came back running. He was small. He got back in them same covers again. He treat him nice. He said, "I'm gonna take him for my son. I want to take him to the children so they could get acquainted with him. I want to raise this boy up." So he took him and just treat him nice. And this boy got used to him. He won't go nowhere, he just follow him around. So they didn't get into no war again. They wanted to go home on account of this child, you know. They didn't want to--just tired you know. He said, "We just go back home." So it took so many weeks to get back home. But when they came back home there was two or three men gone that went with them. But that's just natural in a war--bound to be some losses. So he came back home. Everybody was glad to see them. And he brought a little boy. He said he had little children. He said, "Children, I want you to--this is your brother." There was some boys and girls. He said, "This is your brother, your little brother." He said, "You all treat him nice. Play with him. Don't mistreat him." He said, "He's going to be in our family." So they did. And they just took him in as their family. And he got so used to it and he growed up among the Indians. And that's Old Man Kodesy.

KODESY MARRIED ANOTHER CAPTIVE, A SPANISH GIRL

(Kodesy, oh, it is?)
