

Jenny: He found a place where they could get out. And they got out the same way. And it was so cold. It was blizzard. But they started out when they got out. They started out. They had to get away from that place because if daylight come, they see them and kill them. So they just run for their lives. They were afoot. I don't know how far they got. If one were to fall, they'd freeze. Anyway the rest of them went on. Another one fall like that and that left two, three or four. And they just couldn't handle nothing. They were just froze. Anyway, Sétgóng' à went and tried to help them. And there was a big river and a lot of trees. They finally came to that place at daylight and that river was icy. And nothing on this side but across there was plenty of wood--dry wood and limbs laying around. And when they were on this side yet, he said, "I'm gonna lose all of my boys." He said, "And that I don't want it to happen." So there was buffaloes. They were cold, I guess, and they was in a bunch too. So he went and killed. He killed three. He skinned them. And you know that on the hairy side, they're green--they're fresh, you know, on that hairy side. He got this boy and wrap him up and laid him down. And another one--he didn't butcher the buffalo, just took the hides off. And wrapped them up on the hairy side. And they have a lot of hair. Yeah, and laying them down there. And he went to the river that was so icy. He got--he said that's the only way he get them across. Walk on that ice. It crack but anyway he swim and got across. And they carry matches--these rocks, some kind of rocks are good matches. Well, he gathered up some small sticks and then he picked up that rock and just hit it. Just like matches. I don't know what kind of rocks they were. Anyway, he done that and then build that fire. It burn and he pile on big dried wood on
