

high school learning. A senior, for instance, sometimes they don't buy announcements because they know they can't pay for them. We can help them buy their announcements as an incentive award, so that they can feel as proud to be graduating and sending them to people, letting them know that they are graduating, as anyone else. Caps and gown are always a problem. There's financial things that they have to do at the end of these years, that I think that we could have a kind of incentive award for. I had a child that didn't want to go to school one time. Because there was one class that he didn't have a work book in and every day he went to class, that teacher jumped on him--"when are you gonna get your work book"? And every day when he walked in to that class, he knew what was coming and he got to the point where he didn't even want to go. So you see, we can maybe solve a lot of the little bitty things that I don't think that most of the problems that Indians have in school today, aren't ever big--they are small. And they involve pride--and they involve a little bit of feeling about someone else, that I think that this group can give. Say as a result by helping him financially, there's a problem of helping him financially, because sometimes everybody wants you to help them--you see. Maybe we can put some type of criteria as far as need, necessity etc., are involved and help them in this way, because we know that they are not going to learn if they don't have the tools to learn with. And there's no need in telling them how important an education is when they know they don't have the necessary tools to get the education with. And of course, again, like I say, I am dwelling on one area, but this is the area that I am concerned with and that I work with and I hope that people in other areas will get up and say, how we can possibly help in that way.

Mr. Timmons: Bud, don't you think that some of these little things in the school situations can be solved by the parents and not knowing that they may