

CONCLUSION OF BEAR GIRL STORY

Jenny: Back to her. And then I guess she left to cook it. And then they built a big fire and let that wood burn and be ready-- get a pair of extra, you know, extra moccasins. Tie them up together and be ready to get away because "We're going to be waiting over here for you." "And when that wood is really burning, if she threaten you or say anything, you get a piece of that wood that's really burning and you just hit her with that--and especially on the face. Let her go blind and then you just run out of that tipi and run for your life and we'll be waiting right here." So she took the rabbit back and she said, "I got the rabbit." She said, "How did you kill it?" "Like you said, just like you told me to," she said. "You put it over there and throw at it. I want to know if you really killed that rabbit." So she put it--kind of put it on something, I guess, against a pole or something and then throw at it with this club and sure enough, she hit it right there where it was hit. She said, "Yeah, I believe you. Cook it now. I'm hungry." I don't know how she cooked it but she cooked it. And she gave it to her and she was eating it. You know how them bears eat. "I want some water." Got water and then she said, "You build fire and make it warm in the tipi." And she put lot of wood on it--a big trunk of wood. And when it was really burning, then that bear just laid down--got full, you know, and laid down and went to sleep. So this girl's getting ready. That time her brother told her to get ready. Boy, she got a big log that was burning with a lot of coal and fire--just red hot. That blaze was just burning. She got it and looked at her and she was just snoring away. Boy, she got it on her face down. You know. Boy, she said, "Wow!!" And away this
