

called (Indian name). That was the turtle and the rabbit story. Of course, the rabbit he, I think, he hurt his leg or something. And this old turtle, why he was just going on steadily. The rabbit thought he had plenty of time to fix his leg and he'd get there. Of course, the turtle, he beat the rabbit to the food that they was going to get. I believe it was berries or something to that effect. But the turtle beat the rabbit. I think they have a hare and a rabbit story today in the story books, but it is almost the same. As I recall, the turtle beat the rabbit. And the rabbit couldn't get over it. And, of course, I think the turtle sang a song or something. That's when they'd sing this little song. And he just mentions that he beat the rabbit to this food. And keep mentioning as I remember, he kept saying (Indian word for rabbit) in this song. So that meant that rabbit. So, that was one of the stories I remember. That was a lot of other stories about a coyote. There was a story, in particular, about two coyotes trying to be very smart. Out smart one another. And I think they--one was hiding or something. They was gonna meet someplace and like all coyotes they always like to hide. So, one of these coyotes was hiding by a log and when the other coyote came by why he scared this other coyote, and he fainted. The way they tell it. And this way why this other coyote got to go there first. I think he was going after food, too. A place, they knew, they could get food. That was about the two coyotes. The coyote was always in these stories. Let's see, I don't quite recall what they call the coyote. Of course, they never spoke of a wolf too much. There's always the coyote, always the bad character in these stories. And the wolf, they didn't mention him too much.
