

these tribes, they got together. I don't know how many tribes. But just certain tribes--they trying to find a tribe that killed one of their warriors. Which other tribes was trying to (do). They try to kill him. I don't know. They say, either he's a medicine man or they just got lots of nerve or I don't know what. And these people, they ask these visitors. They said, "Maybe you know somebody--a tribe--that killed one of our bravest warriors. Lot of tribes tried it. They all failed." He kind of puts on kind of a show or something. All his people are watching when he does that. And he sits down. And these warriors, you know, they get on a horse and they kind of speed right by him, you know, shoot at him. They can't hit him. They use guns. Muskets, you know--thess old-timer guns. And they use bow and arrow. Even some of these staffs (lances), you know, try to hit him. Sometimes he lay down (on his back) and cross his leg. That's the way, way back there, they used to sing like that, you know. When they're enjoying theirselves, they make theirselves comfortable. And he was laying there and these guys speed right by him on horseback and shoot at him. Shoot arrows at him! So, somehow Apaches--Apaches had one man. He's pretty good shooter, you know. And they didn't think they'd have much chance because they heard about this fellow, you know. And so somehow they met up with them. This tribe. So they look at each other. See that man walk out--that man that puts on a form of show. So these Apaches was on one side. This tribe was on this side. This fellow, he come out. He was a great leader. He's got everything on. Got feathers (?) on, they have. Got lots of decoration. So he sat down almost in the middle. Apaches, they watching him. He's kind of putting on a performance out there. I guess he was fixing a place comfortable. That's the way he does. So he kind of makes a place where this horse would come by, you know. Make it convenient. So these Apaches, they start talking.
