

"I wonder how I could do it?" So they talk to this young man. This young man, he's a pretty good shot. "Well," he says, "I don't think I'm any better than the other tribes. "But," he says, "I'll try." So he fix himself up, you know. Took all his equipment off. He just had on moccasins and apron. And he had some buckskin wrapped around--just like what you call "bracelets" you know. That's all he had on, and a necklace.

So those thoughts, you know, it's handed down from our fathers and grandparents, how these things were. And maybe it's a good-luck charm or something--we don't know. And he's just a pretty strong young man.

And so he kind of looked it over, you know, where this fellow's sitting down. And he got ready. He got ready--just like anything else, like if he's challenged, you know, by another. He's got a little performance going on, you know. So this fellow, he kind of survey that where this fellow sits, you know. Looks it over. Look over what he's going to do, you know. Pretty soon, all right, he got ready and then he walked.

He kind of walked in a circle. He kind of got on the west side. On the west side. He carry his arrow and I don't know what you call that that he carry his arrows in. Pretty soon he pull out one. Pull out one of them arrows. Put it on that bow. He's right due west side of this man. He's smiling at him. And so pretty soon he raise that bow and arrow up. Boy, he pulled that pretty hard. There it goes. He watch that arrow--straight up. You can't hardly see it, you know. Went out of sight. Pretty soon it comes down, you know. When it comes down, it hits right by him. When it hits right by him, these Indians are making fun of him. Hoorah him. And he (the medicine man) kind of hit himself in the mouth, to make that noise. So he got back on the north side, his tribe--this man that's sitting down--his tribe. They're watching. So this fellow, this young man, he's pretty strong. So he put another arrow in there. And he shot straight up again. That arrow goes plumb
