recall whether they had a dinner or what not. It seems as though they would have the party down at the Indian village and they'd have a huge Christmas tree in the roundhouse and the older persons would get together and they would put their gifts under this Christmas tree. And I remember the Indians, sometimes I remember they would buy their children these small ponies called shetlands and there were several of them tied around the tree and [illegible] and all of the gifts and, I would say they, oh, I don't recall how many families were there, but it was most of the families of the Fort Berthold district. And they would go down there and they would hire someone to be their Santa Claus. They would oh, make these bags of candy and they would pass the candies out to everyone who were present and anyone who were visiting at the time and it was more or less an event that would be remembered all the rest of their lives.

I remember it distinctly the times we were down there. I remember one incident that, I think it was either next to a received a puppy, I was given a terrier puppy. And they had this puppy in what you call a [illegible] with windows with screen in this [illegible]. It was a very little [illegible] and this little dog was in there barking and all that. And after all the girls ran up to see who it was for. And it belonged to my brother. I don't remember just what I received at the time, but I think that I received--in the next day or so, some of my gifts for me. And in [illegible] other [illegible] I received something for the [illegible] that is present around [illegible], but I remember we all owned it at the time, [illegible] that we [illegible]--it was a very, very rare occasion to find [illegible] and we appreciated [illegible], I remember it very. The whole [illegible]--[illegible] down and partook in the [illegible]. And [illegible] by, they would [illegible] the [illegible] groups. [illegible], too, enjoyed [illegible], but it was a family [illegible]. And it usually had its own [illegible]. [illegible] they [illegible] respected [illegible] and that's one of the things that remained from the [illegible]. And I often wondered if it would have been
