

(Where did they get their water? Did they have a well back in those days?)

Yes, they had wells...

(Shallow wells.)

Yes, they had wells.

(Now ah, back in those days - now I always like to kinda talk about the weather, you know everyone talks about the weather, back in those days, did they have very severe weather?)

Yes, they had much colder weather than they do now days. I have seen those women take their clothes and go down in the creek, what we call Big Hominy, and wash their clothes. Your folks used to do that, older folks, used to go down and wash their clothes and their - and wash out things in the creek water, which they didn't have to draw it out of this well.

(And those - how did they - it must have pretty hard for persons survive in those - those little wigwams, you might say, and just canvas...)

They were healthy people. Sure were.

(And summertime - they - did they - what activities did they have around in that camp?)

Well, they would have just a meeting, they'd have a meeting just with one another. They seem to be awful social with one another. - They liked to visit with each other and put on little dinner and each one come to the other camps and eat.

BILL BURKHART

(Back - back there, do you remember this old man (name not clear)...we always speak about in my family, what sort of man was he?)

Well he was - he was a very nice little man. He'd went to school. He had been to the Chilocco school, I believe, or somewhere...

Carlisle?)

Carlisle. Yes. And he had a pretty fair education and seem to speak English
