

from the fire we had in this house, were burning wood and he took this-- oh--there was a pretty good size skillet full of coals--hot coals--red coals--and he took a sharp point, it looked like a mirror. I don't know if it was, but that's what it looked like. And the mother of this child brought--she brought it to her father, Mr. Hall, and he made a--what the Indians call "hacking". He made alot of little sharp marks on this baby's chest and on its back. And he had a small horn which he drew up-- drew the blood and this congestion this baby had. And he removed that and when he removed that, he put hot coals between his teeth and blew on this place where he hacked this little baby. And I guess that was to keep the infection out--sterilize it. No infection. But it was--we were allowed to see him do that so we was very observant to everything. And he did that on the front on its chest and then he turned it over and he hacked the back--small areas, oh, the size of a 50¢ piece, that small of an area he hacked. And then he drew this congestion out and then he blew hot coals again. He held these coals between his teeth and blew on it, oh, three or four times and then he cleansed it with a clean cloth and immediately afterward when he finished, why the baby began to breathe real easy. The fever went down and by evening, why, they was just fine; breathing all right and eating. And it was a very small baby. I suppose--it wasn't even a year old. And I--I actually seen that. And I seen that baby get well practically in front of our eyes. And I thought that was really something. Mr. Hall, I know, has performed many, oh, of these things--this type of thing. I think they do that for people with eye infections or something, do a hacking on their temples. I've seen that done about the same thing and the people seem to feel better afterwards. And there's this lady I know who had the arthritis real bad and sort of an infection set in on her leg and she couldn't walk. And she was on crutches. And she was on the
