

go, she lay down. She's just tired and she went to sleep. She went to sleep and that bull began to talk to her. "I'm going to save you. I'm going to save you. I'm going to take you home. I'm going to let you see your mama and your daddy. I'm going to take you home. Don't (be) scared of me. In the morning somebody going to come and take you home. He's going to go home with you. Going to watch you until you get home." Oh, she dreamed that. He give her power. He give her all kind of power. Medicine, too. He blow his breath to her. "Whooo! Whooo!" Like that. Now. She got everything. Now in the morning she woke up early. She's laying down. She's laying down in the grass. And she was so hungry she don't know what to do. And she's weak. And you know he doctor her with his tongue. He lick her all over. And she said. "Get up. Somebody going to feed you." They was under the timber. She woke up and she got up and she lay down. And that bull just jump up. She got scared and jump up and ran away. And there comes big wolf. Bunch of wolves, they came and they brought some meat for him. See, they going to feed him. "That's the one that going take you home." My, poor thing. And they put the meat down, and together they stick a--bring it down. That woman, she make a fire. She cook her meat. She cook all of them and she tie them on the rack. And she load it and she began to go. And see, them wolves, they took her to her home. They took her home several days. And when night come--about four nights she's going--they began to talk to her. They said, "My friend, you're going to get home tomorrow--tomorrow when the sun goes up. Maybe it's about one or two o'clock. You're going to find your people. Maybe they're going to find you and they be glad to have you. And you're glad to see them." They was going. Then coyotes was making a way for her. See, way back, something happen, like
