

They've got it pretty well filled up you know. Had a lady's monument up there.

(Yes sir.)

And I got there when they unveiled that monument and, (words not clear).

(Well)

Way back in there. Well she's buried in here. (Informant is not close enough to microphone)

(Well)

Old Blo- old Bloomer place. Now them Bloomers can tell you all about that.

(Alright)

There's a cemetery now there and how come me to know this, how come me to know there's a boy works on the highlines--

(Yes sir.)

Electriclines, his name is Ernie Stoker. He come along one day, he said, "Jess, you know there's a big cemetery over there east of oh, by Grove, over east on the Grand River." I said, "No." He said, "Them old timers is buried right there."

He said, "Stan Watie's got his monument there, his wife's monument there by him"

(Well)

He said, "All the growed, it's all growed up in timber." He said, "How come me to find it, I run across it working on these lines." First thing you know there was a little cemetery. And he said, "There's a lot of them buried there." Now then, there's another place called Salone Cemetery.

(Salone)

Now that's way up, oh it's way up by Honey Creek there about where the little town Dodge used to be. Right south there on Honey Creek. Salone Creek. And there's another one where Jeff Hardy lives on up there, on Prairie Creek, they call Joe Ward Cemetery.

(Well)
