

Mr. Fields speaks on the discipline of children in the old days. For the most part well-mannered children do not grace the homes of to-day, because parents do not teach their children respect for their elders, the common courtesies, or be a good influence to them. It is with pride that he tells that his was a happy home and each shared a mutual love for one another. The Indian parents do not believe in striking their children, but instead they talk with them.

Mr. Fields talks about the spiritual outlook on life as seen and felt by an Indian. In their way they embrace a very serious religious attitude in their everyday living. Typical of their race they seek the lonely places for their meditations.
