

(Well.)

Now you might want to visit that. Tornado blew it away one time. And they rebuilt it. People, even us, you know.

(Yeah.)

It would come out in the Tulsa paper. And Charley Harveston was here.

Course he's done passed on now. And he had give the history way way back there.

And now this Cherokee City I was telling you about--that's where the Indians used to get their strip payments.

(Yeah.)

Boy they'd go to Cherokee City and get drunk. And buy what they needed all the time.

(Yeah.)

Now that's maybe three quarters of a mile or a mile. A big old stone building. They had a--then they had a water mill on the other side. There was two brothers, one of them owned the store. And the other one owned the water mill. Now did you hear about that Proctor fueding way years ago?

(Just a little bit.)

Yeah. Well that's where they first started. Right there at the old water mill.

(Well my goodness!)

And that's just above where you cross the river. And I don't know what caused it. But you know they used to be rough in this town.

(Yeah they were at one time.)

Killing didn't amount to much.

(Uh-huh. And they fought right down there?)

They fought both ways. Both at Proctor and up here too. The fued--the Proctor's would come up here. And they'd have a battle. And go back. And pretty soon--why pretty soon Botts, they'd get together, and they'd go down,
