

the Indians' side of the view, the Indian view. The way, they tell it, just like I told you over there, they carry the peace pipe around and different tribes smoked it and went up there to help in the revenge. The plan was that they was to capture Custer alive. And they took all the tribes up there and each tribe generals its own tribe. The plan was that they go at a place where the battle take, they had it all planned out where they was going to have the battle and there was two creeks. One creek running this way and another creek running this way and they meet. And those Indians was to fill those creeks in a V shape. And there was a mountain over here I think, and the Indians were all supposed to be in those creeks. And it was sort of a valley in between and they said the plan was that those with the fleetest horses was to go as a bait over the hill to the cavalry camp to bring them into this valley. I'm just telling you what that old Indian was telling me.

(That's fine.)

A whole lot of old Indians setting there, telling how that battle took place and I wasn't asked to sit there but I just wanted to hear it so I sat there too. An old Indian that was in that battle, he took part, he was the one telling it. He was telling it over here among a lot of our different tribes of people in Craterville Park in the early days. He said the plan was that these Indians with the fleetest horses go over the hill and run into the cavalry like they was raiding them and shoot into them and then the cavalry
