

all the shingles off again. We propped up the whole roof and turned it. (Laughs)

(That's a good idea.)

I'll tell you, afterwards he moved to Anadarko and he joined the police force. He lived over there. That's a long time before the country opened. There was no roads, I told you, but there was a great country trail from Ft. Sill going west. Close by his house, about a quarter mile from his house. He built a house right on top of the hill.

OUTLAW LEADER POSES AS CARETAKER OF INDIAN HOUSE

I don't know where he found the man, but he got a caretaker in this house with a wife and one boy:

(A white man?)

White man, a white woman and a boy about 12 years old. This boy played with my uncle all the time. I'll tell you about this man. We don't know who he was or where he came from, but my uncle knows where he got him and all that, but he live in there a long time and he never bothered people. He never harm anybody, but he was supposed to be the farm caretaker but he doesn't do too much farm work. He rides a horse lots--up and down. We'll find out who he was later on. He was the head of the outlaws. And that was their headquarters and he had a big corral built close to the house. And when the outlaws come, they put their horses in this corral and go into the house and eat and sleep. And he runs his wife and boy out to our house. She comes over. She didn't know what's going on. She slept over till the outlaws go back home. Well, this man's name was Johnson. I don't know what his first name was, but I know his name was Johnson. And his wife
