

down. So I went and got them finally. They rode in--they hired a big truck. They brought their horses and everything. And they moved down here. And I don't know, I believe the first year I was here I met Jenny. Oh, I seen her three or four times. See, I met her and shortly after I met her, her father passed away. Well I seen her three or four times that year. And we hit it off pretty good together. And the next year--I believe it was the next year, her sister died--Mary. And then it was up to Jenny. After her father died she went to school at Kansas City. She graduated up there, at the Loretta Heights--I don't know if it's Loretta Heights or not, but it's Loretta school I know. She graduated there. Then she come back. I think we went together about three years. I went to Arkansas City. And I worked up there. I took a team of horses. I earned a dollar and a half a day working a team of horses. And Angie went along. We rented a house and we took in boarders. And I can't remember how much we charged them. It wasn't much. I must have worked up there three or four months. And things got kind of tight here at home. Well, I had hogs. I had to come home every weekend and take care of my hogs. And the government finally come along and bought them out at fifty cents a head. I think I had eighty head. And they made a mistake in their book work and they never did pay me. (Laughter) I had forty dollars took. They shipped them to Wichita and I don't know what they done with them. Just little pigs about that tall. But we shore had a hard time. We kept some sows. Then I just stayed there. And I raised hogs for Josephine. And we butchered them. We made pretty good money. I think the lawyers they killed lots of cows. They went around--I don't know how much they paid, three or four dollars a head. They just run them up in the corner and shoot them. Poor people come and they butchered them. Butchered them, canned the meat. Didn't save the fat or nothing. I know there was some colored people came down there. That was a woman named Mrs. Little and you know she wasn't going to let them have them.
