April 21, 1937

One of the childhood recollections of Mrs. W. D. Black of Mangum is the abduction of Judge F. B. Duke, of Mangum, by a group of cowmen. The cowmen believed that one of their number was falsely accused of mixing his brands and the group was determined to prevent the case from being tried.

They decided on the simple expedient of kidnapping the judge and taking him to Quannah until the term of court was over. Mrs. Black recalls that the group stopped at her father's postoffice and general store at Duke, Okla. and proceeded to help themselves to the merchandise. They ripped open sacks of meals and fed the contents to their horses. Others punctured cans of tomatoes and fruit with pocket knives, and proceeded to enjoy a lunch. After the raid, they left without a word about settling the account. The next day, however, they returned with the indignant Judge Duke, and settled the bill to the satisfaction of the storekeeper.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Philips, Mrs. Black, was the first child born in the pioneer community. Her parents had immigrated to the county from Dallas, Texas in 1890. They located at Duke where Mr. Philips operated a postoffice, general store, bank, and gin.
