An interview with W. W. Wade,
Mangum, Oklahoma

Eunice J. Mayer, Field Worker,
Indian Pioneer History, S-149,
April 26, 1937

W. W. Wade of Mangum came to Old Greer County in the fashion familiar to so many old timers--the wagon train. The convoy of eight wagons left Collins County, Texas in the spring of 1898, and arrived in Greer County early four weeks later.

The newcomers found the growing of crops hard to undertake because of recurrent droughts and the difficulty of securing seeds and agricultural implements. As a consequence, the immigrants turned to stock raising, and working about the range as the chief source of livelihood. Mangum had not yet received the influx of settlers it was to receive five or six years later. The settlers had to content themselves with living close to the soil; making a hard living theretofore. Game was easily available, and a spirit of hospitality and friendliness, peculiar to a open range country prevailed everywhere.

Most of the immigrants who stayed in Old Greer County sometime at all liked the new land so well that they decided on a permanent residence. Probably, a fourth of the newcomers first saw this County with no intention of staying. However, with coming of the railroad and the opening of a land office here, settlers began coming thick and fast. Mangum began a phenomenal growth, and became the metropolis of the new empire.
